In this project, I intend to show human suffering in different situations and the search for hope to go beyond absurdity, with comic images.

After many difficult experiences on the path of life, hoping to go beyond the absurd, I have come to the conclusion that suffering is part of nature and that man cannot escape it. Perhaps it is possible to escape from suffering, but to escape it means to remain in the void, that is, in eternal suffering itself!

Since being forced to leave my homeland, the things I have been through have made me someone else, then many others as I moved away from it. The philosophy of Albert Camus and the myths of ancient Greece helped me to fight against the emptiness that threatened me and to get out of it. After crossing eight countries, I realized when examining my immigration file in France that exile had become a part of me.

At the same time, the world was suffering from Covid-19 ; I witnessed the struggle of society to overcome and rediscover a form of hope. To ward off this sense of the absurd, I tried to stay in motion, repeating the fate of Sisyphus. Looking at my own shadow, I became aware of my presence in a part of the universe.
